

Opera host families gain behind the scenes perspective

Wearing sequined costumes, appearing in the spotlight, attending cast parties and traveling from city to city – the life of an opera performer might seem glamorous.

However, it's hard work, say Annapolis Opera host families.

They should know. Hosts get a behind the scenes look at what a performer's life is like during the three to four weeks the performers stay with them.

"It's a very demanding career," said Sunny DeVese, an Eastport resident who has hosted performers the past three years. "They rehearse many hours, and those hours can be strange."

Hosts like DeVese are a Godsend to the opera performers, who often spend weeks, if not months away from their homes. "Staying with a host is like a home away from home," said Shannon Jennings, a soprano who plays Marguerite in the upcoming Annapolis Opera "Faust" performance. "It's more intimate [than a hotel] and you get a firsthand experience of the location; you get to know the area."

The host program has been in existence for 42 years, said Annapolis Opera General Manager Kathy Swekel.

"It's a very personal and unique connection between the community and the opera and its performers. Some of the hosts and performers stay in touch for years afterward. The hosts also support the performers by attending their concerts and operas all over the country."

"The other benefit [of the host program] to the opera is a financial one," Swekel said. "Housing a large number of performers for several weeks would be so cost prohibitive that the opera could not afford it. By being able to bring in the best talent from across the nation we provide the community a world-class production."

According to Swekel, it costs about $65,000 to $80,000 per opera performance for a company like the Annapolis Opera. One production can have up to three performances. This is because it requires all of the performing and visual arts, including the symphony orchestra, singers/performers in lead roles, chorus members and other singing and acting roles, dancers, special stunt or acrobatic roles, set design and construction, costume design and construction, lighting and audio design.

"And that is not all that is needed," Swekel said. "My usual line is that it takes 30 people backstage to get one performer on the stage. It is the most expensive art form because it requires all the art forms."

Combining all of the art forms makes opera "the complete entertainment," said longtime opera supporter Mary Ann Elliott, who has hosted performers for six years.

"When you host, you feel the great passion that these performers have. Success is a glimmer for them, so they have to be passionate," said Elliott who has attended opera classes for years at the Annapolis Senior Center.

Elliott once hosted a performer, Michael Wade Lee, and his wife, and tells of a time when Lee sang in her kitchen for her neighbor: "He sang 'Nessun Dorma,' written by Puccini, and I'm telling you, Michael Lee's voice in my kitchen... my husband had pots and pans hanging and I swear they [the pans] were swinging."

Another host, Annapolis resident and opera board vice president, Tom DeKornfeld, knows a bit more about the hard work of an opera performer. DeKornfeld once participated in the opera, Rigoletto, as a "super," a non-singing, non-speaking opera role.

"You really gain an appreciation for both their professionalism and the energy it takes to sing and rehearse day after day," he said.

DeKornfeld and wife, Nina Fisher, have hosted performers for four years. This time, they are hosting Joshua Dennis, the lead role of "Faust."

Dennis said he learns something new from each host.

"They open your mind to new ideas and experiences and that can be really wonderful," he said. "Once I stayed with an artist who taught me about prints, and that was fascinating. Tom and Nina are huge runners and I hate running, but now I feel like I should give it another chance."

DeKornfeld says he learns something new from the performers, too.

"It's a great way to get some insight into the life of a professional musician; a behind the scenes of the opera," DeKornfeld said. "Sometimes we can hear them warming up and practicing in their rooms."

Like DeKornfeld, DeVese enjoys hosting performers, but some of her guests have been four-legged. DeVese, who doesn't own a dog, has welcomed performers and their dogs with open arms.

Soprano Megan Marie Hart was one of those performers.

"Not only did Sunny open her house to me, she also generously allowed me to borrow her car and welcomed my dog and later, my entire family," said Hart, now the lead soprano in an opera house in Germany.

"Sunny goes far above and beyond in her hostess duties. We keep in touch all the time, and I am so grateful I got to know her through Annapolis Opera. Always traveling and being in new cities can be hard on singers when nothing seems familiar, but supportive and caring opera lovers like Sunny really make what we do worth it."

Hart, has had good and bad experiences with hosts. She counts her times in Annapolis as one of the best.

"My experience both times in Annapolis were amazing. I would always come back to sing at Annapolis Opera if I had the chance, but if I don't have the chance, anytime I am near the city, I will visit Sunny."
